Ethics & International Affairs, the quarterly journal of Carnegie Council, is pleased to present a Special Issue on "Rising Powers and the International Order," featuring a roundtable organized by G. John Ikenberry and Shiping Tang.

(PRWEB) March 14, 2018 -- "Ethics & International Affairs," the quarterly journal of Carnegie Council, is pleased to present a Special Issue on "Rising Powers and the International Order," featuring a roundtable organized by G. John Ikenberry and Shiping Tang.

One of the great dramas of world politics across the centuries has been the rise and decline of leading states. The roundtable brings together distinguished international scholars to reflect on the ongoing grand power transition, focusing on the ways that rising states may be shaping and reshaping global order. Each essay investigates the present and future order from the perspective of a different international actor, including China, India, Russia, the EU, and the United States, as well as the BRICS writ large. The collection will be valuable not only to international relations theorists and those who study rising powers but also to anyone concerned about the normative implications of a shifting global order, including scholars of global governance reform, international law, and human rights.

Beyond the roundtable, the Spring 2018 Special Issue also contains an essay by Ayelet Shachar on golden visa programs and the marketization of citizenship, a review essay by Gillian Brock on eliminating corruption, and four book reviews.
