D J McCran Tells the Tale of the Most Haunted House in London

New marketing campaign is set for ‘50 Berkeley Square’

LINCOLN, England (PRWEB) February 07, 2019 -- D J McCran returns to the publishing scene with the release of “50 Berkeley Square” (published by Partridge Africa in December 2017). Set for a new marketing campaign, the novel follows a journey through the centuries that uncovers the mysteries surrounding the most haunted house in London.

Jim Cartwright, a young employee of the London International Gazette, is mysteriously drawn to a suicide at the infamous ghost house of Berkeley Square. Unaware of the true horrors that lie within the walls of the 18th-century, Georgian town house, Jim is forced to take a journey into a strange, new world. He must work out what he has gotten into and why he is experiencing visions from the past.

“I believe we, as people, experience horrific incidents throughout our lives. By reading ghost stories, it offers people a way of looking at horror without actually having to live it — it offers an escape,” McCran says, on the book’s highlight. “I want readers to enjoy this horror story, visit London and see the place for themselves.”

About the Author
As a child of military personnel, D J McCran moved across Europe for the first 15 years of his life, until his family settled in Lincoln, in the East of England. He began his working life as a stage technician at Lincoln’s Theatre Royal, progressing to a touring stage manager with many different and diverse productions. McCran currently teaches in a rural, secondary school in the county of Lincolnshire, where he has been an established member of the school for the past 17 years. Married and with two children, McCran likes to spend time with his family and encourages their many different pursuits, as well as watching sport and playing bass guitar in his band.
