Surprising Reasons Why Car Insurance Rates Are Influenced by the Credit Score

Compare-autoinsurance.org (https://compare-autoinsurance.org/) announces a new blog post, “Credit Score And Insurance Rates?”

LOS ANGELES (PRWEB) February 15, 2019 -- Compare-autoinsurance.org has released a new blog spot which highlights the importance of credit score in determining auto insurance premiums.

Amongst the many factors used to create a risk profile for their customers, insurance companies take into consideration credit score. This factor tells the companies how likely are to pay your premiums. Since it is a risk-based business, the ability to repay your debts becomes critical.

• There are few states where legislation forces insurance companies not to take in consideration credit score when rating a potential customer. In California, Massachusetts, and Hawaii using credit score as a rating factor is illegal. Otherwise, it will impact costs. • Naturally, drivers will poor FICO score will have to pay more for car insurance, in order for the companies to compensate for the increased risk. Also, many companies claim that there is a correlation between credit score and the chances of making a claim. According to them, people with poor credit score are not that capable of handling finances and are more likely to ask for reimbursement when accidents happen. They will even ask money for a minor accident which would otherwise be paid from personal finances by responsible persons.

• Drivers with a poor score, 524 or below, will pay twice or more for car insurance when compared with a driver of similar profile, but with excellent credit score. Credit score can be improved over time, with each improved tier saving on average 17% on annual premiums.

• Improving the credit score from poor to good, can save 32% on insurance premiums. Improving the credit score from good to excellent can save an additional 27% on car insurance rate.
