Insurance companies analyze multiple factors when they determine the premiums paid by a customer. In some cases, insurers offer policies that are considered too expensive by their customers. Although some of the factors that determine a car insurance policy are beyond the driver's control, other factors can be modified.

Policyholders can get better premiums if they follow the next methods:

- Avoid committing traffic violations or accidents. Most insurance companies offer a good driver discount to those drivers that didn't accumulate any traffic ticket or were involved in a car accident in a certain number of years. Many insurance companies will offer this discount after three years of clean driving, while other insurers will wait even five years to apply this premiums reduction.
- Maintain or improve the current credit score. Policyholders that have poor or average credit score pay more on insurance compared with those that have a good or excellent credit score.
- Drive less than the average US citizen. Drivers that use their cars rarely should inform their insurance companies. Policyholders that drive fewer miles than a certain amount, can qualify for a low mileage discount.
- Drive a vehicle that is cheap to insure. Policyholders can lower their insurance if they purchase the right vehicle to insure. Sports cars or exotic vehicles are expensive to insure. Drivers are recommended to purchase cars that were slightly used but have plenty of safety devices already installed.
- Park the car in a safe spot, preferably in a garage. Having the car parked in a garage has multiple advantages. Drivers will protect their cars against thieves and severe weather alike. Besides that, insurance companies will also lower insurance rates.
- Combine policies. Policyholders that have multiple insurance policies like homeowners insurance and car insurance, should talk with their insurer about the possibility of combining them. Most insurers offer discounts for bundling multiple policies to them.
